

Abstract

A new kind of carbide tip for tree stump cutting, where the surface of the carbide tip is serrated, having multiple grooves in different geometric arrangements. The presence of the serration effectively reduces resistance when the carbide tip is used to cut into tree stump and enhances heat dissipation due to increased surface area that contributes to better metallurgical stability of the carbide tip.